BRENT JENSEN

Transforming paint into detail

Brent Jensen's newest show at the Waterhouse Gallery in Santa Barbara will feature paintings from Maine, New England, pastoral scenes from Georgia and architectural scenes from a recent trip to Europe.

"I've been mixing it up a bit lately," says Jensen. "I never like to get stuck with a certain genre so I like to do a variety, from seascapes and landscapes to architecture. I just moved to Atlanta, Georgia so I'm also enjoying painting this new area as well."

Moving to Atlanta from California gave Jensen an opportunity to drive across the country and see the land in a way that he never had before. He was also pleasantly surprised by what he saw during his first contact with the South.

"I went through states like Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia and was shocked because the landscape and the colors are similar to what I saw while painting in Normandy, France," says Jensen. "I didn't know what to expect, but when I got here I saw pasture scenes with daisy flowers and cows in the meadows with old barns behind them. It is very beautiful and, like France, all the farmers keep their pasture lands very clean which shows a respect for the land."

Jensen finds that as he progresses as a painter, he is relying less on his drawing skills and more and more on experimenting with the medium.

"I like to be playful with the perspective and not keep it tight and rigid," says Jensen. "What's fun to do is to keep the work loose but still have it believable, which comes from just playing with the paint to the point where a little dab of paint becomes a window and maintains the look of one." ●
